FUND MANAGER'S COMMENTS

The unexpected escalation in the Middle East, caused stock markets to move sharply negative in October. In early November, however, we saw a recovery, with stock markets today back at the same level as in early October. This positive reaction seems to be mainly due to the fact that inflation rates in both the EU and the US are on a downward trend.

Jerome Powell, at the past policy meeting, pointed to the hopeful development in inflation figures, but at the same time stressed the need not to cheer too soon. Early last year, we already discussed that the Fed made a historic mistake by viewing post-COVID inflation as short-lived and transitory and therefore kept interest rates at a low 0% level. Powell will certainly not want to risk a second major mistake being attached to his name by easing controls too early and cutting interest rates. In line with this, it was decided not to raise policy rates during the last two meetings. On the other hand, the economy does seem to be slowing down slightly in the US and certainly in Europe. This effect is exactly what the central banks intended with their policies. This negative news about a slowing economy can indirectly be seen as positive, as it suggests that we may have reached the peak of interest rate hikes and that, sooner or later, the Federal Reserve would cut interest rates. Which is positive for both bond and, equity markets.

Furthermore, the current macro picture also looks more and more like the "textbook definition" of a recession: economy is doing well, inflation gets too high, central bank raises interest rates causing the economic slowdown, central bank lowers interest rates again to get the economy back on track.

There were no significant transactions in the portfolio in October.
